You can watch video footage of Devil's Share and Galactic Hitman by clicking those prior links – they carry all the classic hallmarks of a Digital Homicide production. The assets are all store-bought, they're both hideous to look at, interactively generic, unfinished, and broken in some significant way. The only difference is the rebranding of the developer – surely a response to the fact that James and Robert Romino know their prior company's name is mud on Steam these days.

It's also worth noting that Galactic Hitman's artwork has been taken from elsewhere, just like the initial art for The Slaughtering Grounds was. You can see the original imagery here, which Faker-ECC may have purchased from Shutterstock. Does DH even have a single artist?

[Note: Initially I suggested Digital Homicide just took the image from a Deviantart artist without permission, not knowing it was also sold on Shutterstock. The text has been edited to reflect this.]

When you can name yourself literally anything on Steam, it's impossible to know who is a legitimate developer and who isn't, as we've seen with the case of Faker-ECC. Apparently you don't need to prove your company's legitimacy or even existence, since it's all based on usernames. Here, we've seen it lead to potential legal trouble for the folks who rebranded and accidentally defamed a completely different studio.

Apparently you don't need to prove your company's legitimacy or even existence, since it's all based on usernames. Here, we've seen it lead to potential legal trouble for the folks who rebranded and accidentally defamed a completely different studio.

Someone on Twitter asked me how they "got away" with calling themselves ECC Games. The fact is, they didn't have to "get away" with anything, at least not as far as Steam is concerned. Once again, Valve's lack of oversight makes it easy to just call yourself ECC Games, regardless of who is actually allowed to trade under that name.

Digital Homicide's official channels have maintained radio silence for months, seeming to operate solely through these sockpuppet companies. Being as sly as the Wet Bandits, however, it hasn't taken long for the Internet to dig up their latest sleazy shenanigans.

At some point, this "studio" is going to have to realize it is neither talented enough to become a producer of good games, nor clever enough to trick us into believing it is.

That's not going to happen today though, and its recent chicanery may lead it into very real legal trouble.

Anyway, it's time to get to the really juicy part. Remember when I said that Devil's Share and Galactic Hitman were published under the name ECC Games? Well, there actually is an ECC Games, and it sure as shit wasn't the company uploading crap games to Steam.

A Polish mobile game company by the name of ECC Games reached out to me via email explaining it has absolutely no link to Digital Homicide, and its claim most certainly seems to check out. Its own website features a whole host of mobile games, along with a full-fledged team of Polish developers. It also has a Twitter account which, prior to now, has no history of mentioning either Devil's Share nor Galactic Hitman.

"We would like to inform that we are not designers nor producers of Galaxy Hitman nor Devils Share, games that have been published on Steam," said ECC producer Dorota Muzynska. "We probably fell victim to a people previously known as Digital Homicide. We have already taken legal actions aimed at ceasing infringement of ECC GAMES rights."

Do you think UN regulation of the internet is really a bad thing? Given how poorly many countries handle their legal systems over the internet (particularly America), wouldn't it be a benefit if they just revised the agreement?

The UN thing is so amazingly overblown. It will not "censor the internet" and the things I've read about Anita Sarkeesian having the power to get people arrested is unbelievably delusional. I think it's a good thing that the UN is looking into tackling online abuse and harassment, and I'd say the same thing of Google's recent efforts too. The only people who have anything to be afraid of there are, well, abusers and harassers.

Anybody flouting it to SOPA and PIPA are being ludicrous, and showcasing their complete lack of aptitude for the politics they repeatedly dabble in while claiming they hate politics being involved in everything.

Jim, why do you feel it was necessary to out ECC games as Digital Homicide? It's clear that with the new identity, these guys wanted to start anew and leave the past behind. They can still be criticized, sure, but I think it's spiteful to bring their past reputation into it if it's not relevant.

Yeah it was, because Digital Homicide is more than just a bad developer. It's had a history of shady and dishonest behavior, behavior it was continuing under its new name. The very fact it was damaging the reputation of another company entirely is bad enough, to say nothing of its continued efforts to push games through Greenlight via unscrupulous means.

I will not deny the pleasure I take in sticking it to them, but their name is mud for a reason, and people deserve to know who's really selling their products

Were you going to share the reason why Moo Tech's take down failed? I read that on twitter earlier and haven't found any follow-up.

I will, yes, but currently it's not something I can share. I'm chomping at the bit to talk about it, and will do as soon as I can. It's potentially Jimquisition material, to boot.

Considering the decision by Ubisoft to include a trans person in the new AC, I'm guessing the new Jimquisition is going to be talking about representation of social and ethnic groups in video games, am I close? (I assume ethnic groups because of the picture of vaas)

It is more distinctly tied to Vess and similar things.

Isn't it funny how some people can't comprehend that a male might be interested in female rights so they have to come up with a "his wife/girl makes him say that!!!!" story just to prevent their narrow minds from exploding? Good thing none of that is real.

Step 1: Find a woman to blame

Step 2: Dribble.
